Siding goes well with any home just as mashed potatoes go with any cut of steak-- rare, medium-rare or well-done. This fact wonâ€™t change anytime soon, now that weather systems have grown more random over the years. One thing has changed, though: itâ€™s the preference of Americans on their siding.

Jery Huntley, president of the Vinyl Siding Institute (VSI), says many Americans prefer beauty, resilience, and value for their sidings. One of the most common perceptions is that you cannot have the benefit of one without sacrificing the other. If you do want as many benefits as possible for your siding, it will be a balanced mix. In that case, how can people make the most out of the available siding choices in the market?

The VSI study also found out one persistent trend: combining different siding choices to create a unique combination. For example, vinyl siding can be combined with stone slabs for a high-end look that is an energy and money saver. Some parts of the house exterior are covered in flexible vinyl siding, while the rest is protected by robust stone slabs.

This trend goes well with homeowners who want a classy home but find stone slabs to be too expensive to wrap around the exterior. By replacing a part of the siding materials with cheaper but versatile ones, overhead costs can be cut significantly. Experiment with different combinations to get the right mix for your home.

The VSI study also stated that â€œgreenâ€• is still inâ€”that sustainable solutions are still at play in the selection of siding materials. Insulated siding NJ homes use complies with codes contained in the International Energy Conservation Code. Apart from global standards, todayâ€™s sidings also comply with local and federal material testing and building codes. Many Americans still see â€œgreenâ€• siding as an option.

The choice of siding may change but its role will stay for generations to come. Vinyl siding NJ residents use will grow more vibrant and resilient as the future will bring in further upgrades in the type of materials and the method of production. Yet, whatever choice you make for your siding, itâ€™s still the â€œmashed potatoesâ€• for any cozy home.
