If you are setting up a new home, one of the things that you would want done extremely well is that of lighting. While it can be a DIY job, the best effects are achieved with contract lighting. You could always consider hiring a specialist when it comes to doing your lighting. Here are some of the things you should look out for.

To begin with, think of all the services you need as well as the products that will need installing. Make a list of this and the associated work quality you expect. This is a list that will help you get at least two quotations to start with. What you should know is that most contract lighting is on a fixed rate basis for certain services or deliverables. In almost all cases you will also have a minimum fee that is normally taken for 1.5 to 2 hours of work. While in some cases, some negotiation on the price is allowed, many do not consider it at all.

Make sure that your lighting contractor has a valid and legal license. The best way to check for this is to look at his licenses status on the telephone directory or with your particular stateâ€™s licensing authority. Once you verify the details you can be sure of their services. The service provider should also have a good amount of insurance for liability on the job. This can be for any accidents that may occur or any of your property that gets destroyed. You should also put in place a bond with you contractor. Should the work delivered not be of accepted quality and not finish on time, there will be some penalties involved.

A lighting contractor has a number of roles and you can even get him to install your ceiling fans as well as the light switch and track lighting. You could also look for different lighting styles such as recessed, pendant or install wiring in places you may need it. When you hire a contractor make sure you ask about his experience and for references. Call these references to get an idea of how things work with the contractor and professional approach to the job. One of the ways to find a good lighting contractor is to ask at your building department and see if they can recommend somebody.

Once you are sure of the quality of the service provider you can go right ahead and give your home a makeover.
