Making a Small Business Safer with Mirrors by Eric Blair

Article published on January 28th 2012 | Interior Design

Something as simple as a mirror in many cases can make a business lose less stock to theft and help customers and personnel feel more safe. Crime has grown tremendously over the past few years, and incorporating a few extra security measures can work wonders for the business. Placing mirrors strategically through the business makes it easy for employees and customers to observe around them and in hidden areas.

In order to keep the area looking great for years to come, mirrors should be made out of the right materials. Since glass mirrors can break easily, they are generally not recommended, but they offer the best reflection. While they do not provide the best representation, acrylic plastic mirrors tend to be the best choice for a business.

One of the main functions of mirrors is allowing a customer or staff to see an area from a position they are generally in. Folks are often the most vulnerable when handling large amounts of money in public, and in those situations it is important to allow them to effortlessly see around themselves. This is necessary in situations where high valued merchandise is handled, but can also just offer someone peace of mind. Mirrors can provide customers and employees alike a good way to see around. Globe mirrors may be put at hall or aisle intersections to help people see around the corners far ahead of time.

Directly overseeing an area can be easily covered up by a two way mirror. Using one of these kinds of wall mirrors is a great way to watch any area that one can possibly need to see discreetly. Small cameras can be put in place behind these mirrors and remotely monitored too. In order to make it not look obvious, a mirror can be installed with a frame to look more like a hung mirror. Blending small white mirrors in with the environment will let the employees know they are being monitored and allow you to discreetly monitor clients.

Training should always be provided to the individual that will operate the monitoring equipment. Mirrors can be used for a number of things even if their functions are not immediately obvious. Deterring unethical activity is a huge benefit and also costs a lot less than a system of camcorders placed everywhere.
