One of the upsides to a WSI franchise is having a complete picture of whatâ€™s happening with your business.

This is an innate advantage that small businesses have over larger ones â€” the â€œbig pictureâ€• can be examined by one person and understood clearly. Not so with particularly large businesses.

How often have we seen this trope? Someone is content in their job, going along doing their thing, when suddenly without warning theyâ€™re fired because the business is in a crunch, or something goes wrong that no one knew was coming or could prepare for because someone higher up covered up things? Weâ€™ve seen it with Worldcom, Enron and other businesses, so this is clearly not just disaster mongering.

Compare that to what you get with a WSI franchise. Crises donâ€™t happen like that when you own a WSI franchise; you can see when your revenue is changing and immediately do things to improve the bottom line. You can tell when something has gone wrong, and do things to fix it right then and there.

This isnâ€™t to say there are never any problems â€” of course, there will always be some problems to work on (otherwise, we wouldnâ€™t call it â€œworkâ€•). The point is that instead of having to rely on some else to handle them, you can deal with them directly and in your own time. A franchise is a business that needs the same kinds of solutions as any others. But we do what we can to give you more tools than you have in traditional jobs in order to create those solutions. One of those tools is the transparency and security of being completely in charge of your own business and the whole, big picture.
