Digging for gold is a hobby that can quickly turn into a passion. Gold prospecting is a hobby that is seriously followed by people hoping to be rewarded by the glitter of the fine material that collects at the bottom of the pan. Digging for gold entails hours of back breaking labor and calls for oodles of patience. But the thrill of finding gold, even miniscule traces of them at the end of the effort is simply incomparable.

According to a recent research, only a few prospectors among thousands of people out there are actually able to find substantial quantity of gold deposits during their life time. They usually dig for gold in gold mining districts and areas know to have substantial gold deposits. The chances of finding good quality gold and in fair quantities in such areas are much brighter than when you dig for gold in randomly chosen places.

The availability of new, highly sensitive and mostly inexpensive methods and tools of detecting gold has enhanced the possibility of finding gold deposits. However, most prospectors still use the old and time tested methods of finding gold using gold pans and a few other digging tools.

Prospectors believe that they have a better chance of making regular and steady wages by panning gold near streams in areas known for their gold deposits. They are encouraged by the fact that geologists and engineers who investigate remote areas often find traces of gold during their exploration projects. It is a clear indication that metal bearing deposits are available in potential places. You just need to look at the right places.

Prospectors must be aware of the regulations that cover gold digging and determine whether they are allowed to search for gold and other precious metals in a particular location. Permission must be taken from the appropriate authorities if you are planning to dig in a restricted area or privately owned land. If you want to add a touch of professionalism in your prospecting efforts, you must take efforts to study mining records and geology of the mining areas before you start digging or panning.

The work can be discouraging at times and for this precise reason you must have sufficient capital to support the task. Physical hardship is an inevitable component of gold digging ventures. Even if you donâ€™t discover anything of value for a long time, the challenge and interest of the effort can keep you going.
