Things that you should know about the uniform tax allowance by Robert William

Article published on December 28th 2011 | Investing

You must be aware that it is compulsory for all the law abiding citizens of the country to pay tax to the government of the nation on their individual income that is earned by them. Since it is compulsory for the citizens, most of us feel that taxes are a burden on us and this is one major reason why many people try to evade the taxes with the help of several unfair means. To avoid people from using unfair means to avoid paying taxes, each government of different companies also have the facility of tax exemption under certain category and circumstances which citizens can claim as tax relief.

Claiming of tax relief can be possible under several scenarios like the natural disasters, medical claims etc is possible. One such form of tax relief is the uniform tax allowance. It can be obtained in case you have a uniform to wear on a daily basis at your work place. This simply means that if you have to wear any form of uniforms at your office space, then you are eligible to claim the uniform tax allowance. But only this much information is not enough to get the tax relief. There are many other factors that are associated with it and thus here are some important facts about the uniform tax deduction:

To apply or claim for the allowance, the uniform that you wear at office must be such that you cannot wear it outside your office space. For example, the uniform can have the name or the logo of the company on it such that it is not fit to be worn outside the office. Secondly, there are various kinds of uniform tax deductions available for different kinds of work. Thus you must be aware of the kind and the rate of relief so that you can calculate the amount of money that you can claim as the tax relief. Thirdly, you can claim this tax relief in either of the two ways, either by submitting all the receipts of the uniform or with the help of the flat rate tax deduction.
