A Place of Their Own: Why Watches deserve a Watch Box by Edan K Alvo

Article published on December 17th 2011 | Jewelry

You may be wondering why there is such a wide selection for something as specialized as a watch box. Thatâ€™s because something as special as a watch definitely deserves a place of its own. Also, if you have a large collection of watches its unreasonable to expect them to simply do with the couple of spaces that may be given to them in a standard jewelry box. A watch box is a much better solution, especially if one has a wide range of watches that may be suited to different occasions and/or environments.

One may have watches for work, for athletic pursuits, heirloom antiques received from a father or grandfather. A collection this varied warrants a watch box. The best way to store a watch is on a cushion which the watchband can wrap around. A piece of machinery as impressively designed as a watch needs and deserves such a careful and appropriate storage method. A watch box contains several compartments with such cushions; some have as many as forty.

A jewelry box, as already stated, might have some space for one or two watches, but this may not be enough for your entire collection. Itâ€™s hardly fair, of course, so give such VIP treatment to a couple of watches while the rest are languishing in sub-par storage. Jewelry boxes are great at keeping jewelry pristine, shiny and in perfect condition. A watch box does the same for watches and of course is designed with watches in mind.

With a watch box, all your watches get equal storage rights. Whether the watch is old, new, or somewhere in between, being kept in a watch box will keep it running like the precision machine that itâ€™s meant to be. A watch box is so much more than a series of drawers in which watches get thrown willy-nilly. Each watch is given its own compartment and cushion so no watch is left behind and each one is kept in equally perfect condition and working order.

With a watch box in your home, you wonâ€™t have to worry about where you keep your watches, just as a jewelry box answers the question of where you keep your jewelry. Watches are also very frequently received gifts so its likely youâ€™ll need a bit of space not only for currently owned watches but watches in potentia.

A watch box gives watches (and their owners) just what they need. A special place built with them in mind and designed with their specific qualities and needs in mind.
