Chinese Study Abroad: a Recipe for Success by Maureen Hayes

Article published on June 18th 2012 | Language

For those looking for Chinese study abroad, it is important to know the best ways to set up your study and to get the most out of any program in which you decide to enrol. Whilst it is certainly true that studying Chinese abroad in China is the best way to go, there are still good and bad courses and good and bad methods. If you know the difference between the good Chinese study abroad programs and the bad ones then you will be able to get the maximum possible from your Chinese study abroad.

The first thing to think about is where you want to study Chinese abroad. Do you want to go to somewhere like Beijing or Shanghai, or experience a more traditional Chinese experience in a rural area or smaller city. From big cities to inland towns and coastal villages, there are so many different places for Chinese study abroad. The best thing to do is really understand what your character is like and what sort of place you feel best suits you. This will provide the best study environment possible, which can only be a good thing when you are learning a new language.

Secondly, you need to look at what institute you want to join for your Chinese study abroad. There are a huge variety of institutes in China, and most of them are much-improved from even just a few years ago. However, there are certainly some that are better than others. It is crucial that you research the institute that you are going to attend and make sure it has the right academic level for your needs. This can vary depending on what you want from the course and the length of the course. The right institute will go a long way to making sure your Chinese study abroad experience is a rewarding one.

Thirdly, it is really critical that you know how long you want to spend in China and what sort of level you want to achieve through your Chinese study abroad. There are short courses that can help you give you the basics, or much longer courses that will give you the chance to gain fluency and really immerse yourself in Chinese language and culture. Although you can obviously change your goals as you go, it is important to know what you want to achieve so you can really get there in the quickest time possible. Understand what you want to do with your Chinese skills, and then your Chinese study abroad experience will help to fulfil your long-term goals rather than just being a distraction or wasted study.

There are a whole host of benefits to Chinese study abroad, but you can only see these benefits if you consider a number of important factors before you finally decide on a location, course and course length. Follow this simple advice and your Chinese study abroad experience will not only be academically fulfilling, but it will also be fun, memorable and thoroughly worthwhile.
