When searching for an attorney to represent you for injuries sustained in an accident, find an injury attorney with experience and expertise in the personal injury field. Here are some tips to help you find the perfect legal representation for your needs:

1) Ask the attorney who else will be responsible for your case

If you retain a big firm chances are there’d be a team of secretaries, paralegals and associates handling personal injury matters, who may all have access to your case. There is nothing wrong with knowing who works on your litigation and what their experience is. Many personal injury attorneys in order to minimize expenses (since they don’t get paid until you recover under current retainers in New York) may have non-attorneys working on your case, drafting pleadings, speaking to doctors and adjusters. Make sure that these are experienced professionals who are courteous and knowledgeable about your matter. Finally, you want to be comfortable that the attorney is kept up to date on the case’s progress, so find out at your first meeting about how attorney supervises other legal professional’s work and checks the status of the litigation.

2) Get reviews about attorney or other information online

With an abundance of information available on the web, you may be able to find out how long the injury attorney has been in practice, what law school he graduated from, whether or not he won any big verdicts, his trial record and client reviews. Many firms maintain websites detailing what the practice is about and list client testimonials, as well as information on important legal updates and court decisions. Before meeting your attorney, feel free to research him on line, it will give you a good idea about his practice even before your first meeting. If there is a bad review, don’t be afraid to inquire about it. Don’t automatically assume that the attorney is incompetent from one bad review, give him a chance to explain what happened, within the allowed parameters due to confidentiality issues, and make your determination after hearing what the attorney has to say.

3) Ask around

The old fashion way of asking your friends and family for a recommendation is still a way to go for many clients. With vehicular accidents being so frequent, chances are someone has been represented by auto injury attorneys in a car accident and will be able to opinion on the lawyer and the firm. It is important to remember three different people may have three different opinions about the same lawyer; it’s all about personal preferences. So rather than getting subjective information, find out the facts: how long of a time has passed before the matter settled, did any difficult issues come up and how did the attorney handle them, what was the outcome and was it satisfactory to the client?

Getting the cold hard facts may help you make your decision easier.

Making use of the above suggestions will help you choose the right injury attorney for your case and hopefully lead to a satisfactory result in your litigation.
