Laser Eye Malpractice Cases by Judy Marrow

Article published on May 3rd 2012 | Law

In the past decade, society has come to the point, where laser eye surgery can be used both to repair vision in a CPP disability claim and also as a cosmetic surgery. When you or a loved one goes to the eye doctor to have your vision corrected, and the surgery makes your vision worse, you may be entitled to compensation. For the reason that laser eye surgery is quite dangerous, your eye doctor must put you through a rigorous screening process prior to going through with the surgery. As a result, if your doctor did not screen you, or made an error during the surgery, you may be able to file a catastrophic injury claim.

While the laser eye industry as a whole has made major improvements over the past decade, the results of the surgery are still far from perfect. Meaning to say, the possibility of having an issue after your eye surgery is quite common. In order to assure that your doctor or surgeon is held accountable for his or her actions, you should contact a personal injury lawyer to review your symptoms. Some of the most common issues include poor night vision, dry eyes, blurry vision, photosensitive eyes and halos around lights. If you experience any of these issues, not only should you contact a lawyer, but also your eye doctor.

When a laser eye surgery goes wrong, most victims ask their traumatic brain injury lawyers why them and more importantly why does this happen? One of the most frequently used eye surgery companies is called LASIK. Through the LASIK eye surgery, a patientâ€™s cornea will be thinned out and weakened. What this means, is that your eyes despite being able to see without glasses, are more susceptible to damage should anything go wrong. With this in mind, many lawsuits are filed, because the doctor did not inform the patient of the risks they were opening themselves up to by agreeing to the surgery.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/law-articles/laser-eye-malpractice-cases.htm - Article Side

Judy Marrow - About Author:
If you are looking for more information on a insurance dispute law or any other specialty, we recommend contacting a personal injury lawyer in your area. A a Toronto accident benefit lawyer or a local lawyer will be able to provide you with local information.

Article Keywords:
personal injury lawyer in Toronto, car accident laws, accident benefit lawyer, slip and fall accident lawyer, brain injury law, tort lawyer spinal cord injury, Toronto accident benefit lawyer, disability claim law

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!