American Merchandise Liquidators, Inc., (AML) are at the forefront of an industry that concentrates on the dealings associated with salvaged goods. They buy liquidation merchandise and move it by the pallet load and in larger stocks case, by the truckload. They operate successfully by purchasing huge quantities of general stock and are able to pass them onto consumers for a massively reduced fee. They shift an assortment of items from the latest electrical gadgetry and apparel, to furniture and stationary, for use in the home, office, or workplace.

In using AML to get hold of some real bargains at knock down prices, people have realized they have opened up an avenue of revenue to help themselves through a difficult financial period. If an individual decides to buy wholesale merchandise they can then move it on, via an online auction site, and make significant profits. It is all absolutely above board, and whilst it may seem a little disconcerting to begin with, it can be very exciting, and of course rewarding.

In operation since the early nineties, AML effectively go back to source, and procure goods at hugely discounted cost. They will often buy liquidation material from some of the big retail outlets, or similar high profile establishments, during periods of downturn, which assists both parties. The endorsement that comes from famous branded names, will always aid moving the goods on quickly and also retain a good price.

Possessing the status to sell the leading names at below wholesale cost, means the company are in a fantastically strong position for continued growth.
