If youâ€™ve recently been charged with a DUI, you might be trying to find the first lawyer you can find â€“ any lawyer that will be able t take you to court and give you some much-needed advice. Or, maybe youâ€™re thinking that you donâ€™t want to waste the money on a lawyer. How bad can a DUI charge be anyway?

It could be really bad. And if you donâ€™t have proper representation, it could be devastating. A DUI charge is more than just a fine you have to pay, or community service that will need to be served. While this is sometimes how it plays out for certain cases, itâ€™s certainly not typical and depending on your circumstances, you could lose everything. So, do you need a DUI attorney? Yes!

An attorney is necessary when facing these serious charges because theyâ€™ll be better able to argue with the State and find a punishment that is both fair and as lenient on you as possible. In addition to that, a DUI attorney will be much more familiar with the always-changing DUI laws and will be able to tell you how the laws apply to you, and what your best course of action is.

So, do you need a DUI attorney? If you want to have any chance of getting off of the charges, or you need legal advice on what to do next, then yes, you do. Thereâ€™s no question about it.

When it comes to the fees that your DUI attorney will charge you, youâ€™ll most likely find a whole range of options offered by the different lawyers on your list. From flat fee to hourly rate, and the actual costs associated to both of those, the fees of a DUI attorney vary from lawyer to lawyer. Because of that, itâ€™s best to speak to different lawyers that have different fee structures. This is the only way to find out which fee structure is right for you.

One thing that you must know about DUI attorney fees is that itâ€™s considered unethical, and even considered illegal in some states, for DUI attorneys to charge on a contingent fee basis or rather, only charge you money if they win your case. No legitimate DUI attorney is going to make.
