As and when you start feeling that you have attained the probable age of Shaadi, Vivah or marriage as per society, many peculiar things start happening in your life. Suddenly you will find your neighborhood aunty; your abroad-living cousins, your friendâ€™s friend, probably your family doctor; all suggesting a match for you or telling you the ways to find a suitable one. But the irony is that inspite of having a plethora of options, you will still feel option less, confused and sometimes irritated. If you feel you have attained an age of shaadi, but still feeling confused about taking a further step, the following article may help you:

Make up your mind

The first and foremost thing is to make up your mind. It is very important to make up your mind for marriage. As per Indian culture Vivah or marriage is a lifelong committed relationship. It is not a casual relationship, so it is important to be sure before taking any further step. For making up your mind, you may analyze whether your significant career goals are achieved or not or whether you are self dependent or not. Whether you are boy or girl, you must be self-dependent before marriage. You may be looking for handsome earning guy or girl but then the same applies to the other side too. Moreover, it is extremely important for you to be able to earn a living for yourself so if any misfortune happens in your life you donâ€™t have to be dependent on others.

Think what you expect from your life partner

The next thing to be considered for making a decision for your vivah is to ask yourself what you expect from your life partner in terms of quality, qualifications and compatibility. Different people have different criteria for judging a person. For example, if you are a qualified man or woman, you would like to marry an equally qualified person. Apart from all this, compatibility should be an important key to find the right life partner for you. Donâ€™t just go by things like opposite attracts and such philosophies. It is important to analyze if the person matches your preferences, suits your nature and is compatible with you.

Spend some time with your prospective life partner

Whether you have fallen in love with your childhood friend or met a person through a matrimonial site, you must spend quality time with the one you are planning to get married to. Spend some time but wisely make some space with the other person. Donâ€™t take any step for which you may have to regret later. Spend time with the other person intelligently, be patient, try to explore his/ her qualities and intentions and match them with yours. Ask yourself if you will be able to spend your life with that person or if you find that person suitable and compatible with you for sharing a whole life. Marriages might be made in heaven but they are sustained on earth, so it is important to choose your life partner wisely.
