The process of serving legal papers can become involved by Rob Colbourn

Article published on December 19th 2011 | Others

Whether hiring a process server for a one time serving strictly within the UK or looking for an ongoing process services company which may perform their duties on an international basis, make sure they will be available any time and any location in which you may require their services. Many companies offer discounts for continued service and particularly for recommendations to other businesses. Ask for assurance of qualifications such as are they members of:

1. Association of British Investigators

2. World Association of Detectives

3. Association of Civil Enforcement (qualified bailiffs) Agencies

Whether your need for process services will be only local or within the UK or on an international basis, make certain the process service company you hire will be capable of doing the job by checking their credentials and, if possible, checking references with former clientele. Then you can feel confident when that your requests will be carried out swiftly and effectively.

There is an art to process services

Enlisting the services of a professional process server means you are in need of someone who can perform the duty both legally and safely. The many ins and outs of various legal processes require a knowledge of the laws and how best to perform the act of process service. There are safety issues when ever those being served are resentful to the point of performing harm upon the one who serves papers on them. And knowing just when, where, and how to serve those legal papers, writs, claim forms, court demands, statutory demands, divorce petitions, or family proceedings always makes the proceeding go more quickly, legally, and with a finality that leaves those being served with no option but to comply.

Tracking them down or skip tracing

Often the act of serving papers on someone is the easy part. They must first be found! And this can prove difficult when those being served do not choose to be found. There is a finesse involved when finding those who do not want to be served with a law suit or divorce papers and that may involve what is known as a skip tracer. This means someone who is capable and qualified to become a â€œbloodhoundâ€• of sorts and ferret out the elusive or evasive. As those who do not want to be located often do, they will move frequently, rent their flat without signing a lease, and pay cash to avoid detection through their name on a cheque or note. This makes finding difficult but also more rewarding for those who must seek them out.

Papers must be served to those who are in default

While serving legal paperwork on someone is not quite the same as repossessing property, in both instances the services of a professional who is trained in handling the situation are required and necessary to complete the task in a timely manner. The more quickly and efficiently those papers can be served, the faster the process is completed, which saves money, time, and any trouble that may arise.

Process serversâ€™ job requirements often go beyond the basics

From the basics of serving legal papers for the client to becoming involved in tracking down or investigating those upon who they plan to serve that writ, court demand, or divorce petition, the process server often must extend their knowledge of the proceedings and go a step beyond their comfort zone. They deserve to be paid accordingly and will often send a detailed invoice showing all they did to accomplish the process of legally serving for those who require it. In exchange the legal process moves along smoothly and efficiently for all concerned.
