Transparency: Its Relevance in Non-Profit Organizations' Fundraising Practices by Lauren Edith

Article published on February 16th 2012 | Others

The maximization of grants of non-profit organizations are not fully dependent on successful project execution. Of course, it is part of their organizational responsibility to advocate the highest transparency possible so the public can discern their developmental aims and appreciate the actual goal of their groups.. Through that, they can hold and preserve a firm credible reputation that can acquire the support of more people and hence gain more followers.

These nonprofit groups, however are not required to disclose all transactional information. They still need to keep certain details confidential to safeguard their institutions and secure their interests. Listed below is a transparency checklist that may serve as guide on disclosure of boundaries, which a lot of fundraising groups follow.

Firstly, groups should figure out whether communications with supporters are open, sincere, and not misleading. They also need to ensure that all activities and projects implemented satisfy local and national laws, and are not in opposition to the reasonable requests of grant providers. It is also essential to know if the aims of each venture are met and if achievements are established properly.

Without a doubt, supporters also should know about the financial resources they have invested. It is important for them to discern the fundraising costs and budget allotment, in addition to the realization of the donation they gave. With this goal of transparency, fundraising organizations can use a dependable tool like the Sage non profit software. This financial management solution is utilized by several nonprofit organizations for almost all aspects of their operations.

For instance, the Sage MIP support software is applied in planning and managing budgets and a number of activities, as well as in tracking and enhancing grants. As this accounting tool carries easy-to-navigate application designs, organizations can conveniently input, compile, and manage several entries. Such properties are also the key toward the creation of comprehensive reports that can be offered to supporters or grant providers. In addition, monitoring and analysis can be easily conducted, whicih is why gaps and incongruities can be dealt with to attain utmost transparency.

These accounting tools provide the most acceptable nonprofit solutions, which can be utilized for purposes of accountability and transparency. Organizations that use this software can uphold accountability by explaining, presenting, clarifying, and justifying the actions taken. More importantly, they can ensure the greatest transparency since they can be open with their communications, transactions, and operations, and accordingly allow other people to understand what they wished for and what has been attained. Since both elements go together in ensuring fundraising integrity, it is essential for a dependable accounting software to bind the two effectively.
