Many voters express their support for a political candidate by placing yard signs in their yard. In addition, many campaigns and supporters want to place Campaign Sign along road ways to increase their candidateâ€™s name recognition among voters. The size of your campaign sign depends on the size of the campaign. Generally, itâ€™s been the fold-over paper sign. They have been the least expensive to purchase at medium quantities.

However, corrugated plastic signs have been increasing in popularity over the last few cycles. Coro prices have come down significantly and now, low quantities are available. And now, new technologies allow us to print as few as 10 signs in an order while still being affordable for the candidate. But we see many 50 and 100 sign orders in Coroplast. Large campaigns usually go with bag signs. They are very low cost in high quantity like 2,500 or more. Bag sign boards are very easy to deal with and are pretty durable. You have to take care of many things while placing these campaign signs because sometimes States and local governments restrict when and where campaigns can place yard signs for aesthetic reasons, to limit distractions to drivers, and in the case of disclaimer requirements and campaigning regulations at polling places, to create an even playing field for candidates and promote open and honest political campaigns.

The regulations govern placement of signs and the length of time they may be displayed. While the city can decide where signs are permitted, state law dictates the length of time they may be up. The rules apply to all candidates, regardless of whether they are seeking school, city, county or statewide offices. On city roadways all signs must be five feet from the curb or shoulder. You must receive permission to place signs on any private property. No signs are allowed on property owned by the city, county or school district.
