Hog Hunting in Texas is Really Thrilling by Chris Adam

Article published on March 20th 2012 | Recreation

The adventure sport lovers are in awe of wild hog hunting. Many owners of lands or the big names in the hunting business try to get hold of a large number of varieties of this species so that the pleasures in hunting them are more. The collection of the boars is not only expensive, but their availability is also limited. Wild boars are well known for the damage they can do to the land. Farmers hate them for their ability to destroy a full field in just one night.

hog huntingWild hog hunting is often encouraged by the tendency of the boars to destroy protected cash crops. Even a small herd of these wild pigs can de-vegetaterender big chunka large piece of land and can turn them barren. They can cause severe damages to hillsides, trails and even to the fences constructed by the farmers. For this the farmers had to spend huge amounts of money to protect their high yielding varieties. But do these species have their disadvantages only? They have their advantages as well. Generally the perennials uprooted by the boars come back very fast after being uprooted.

The annual grasses were grown on an artificial basis and gradually replaced the grasses, which were unwanted as well. In this way, the rampages by the wild boars can favor the growth of the native plants and restore the original balanced habitats.

Though the practice of hog huntingwild hog hunting declines in the rainy or the winter months, some of the varieties like the Javelina or the Collared Peccary make the day for the hunter even in odd times. They are the South American varieties, which are really economical and beneficial for the farmers. Many places like Texas, Mexico organizes hunting seasons where as many as 50 countries participate. Though the ecologists may not classify Javelina as the typical boar but this little pig shares some features with the boars as well. Similar in looks and temperament, these varieties are quite popular. They are generally peaceful but become very aggressive and defensive when it comes to any danger faced by their off springs. The Collared Peccary also occupies a considerable percentage of the animal population in states like Arizona and Mexico.
