Advice for Relationship for Combined Families by Jim Anderson

Article published on July 4th 2012 | Relationship

With the divorce rate as high as it is these days, nuclear families are fast being replaced by the growing trend of combined families. More and more people are remarrying, which means that they often have children from other prior marriages or relationships. This causes the need to combine the two families.

Unfortunately, it isnâ€™t as easy as it appeared to be on the old television show The Brady Bunch. However, you can successfully have a combined family without experiencing too many problems. Simply follow this advice for relationship and you can have a great combined family relationship.

Taking the Big Leap

Finding your perfect love match was probably difficult to do. Now that you have found that special someone, you should let both sets of children know about your intentions. Marriage or even just moving in together is a big leap for the adults and this can throw the children into turmoil. It is best to be honest with them about how you feel about your mate.

Advice for relationship: You should also ask the children how they feel about your decision to marry or live with your new partner. It will help your children by listening to their fears and concerns. They will also know that you actually care about them and that you want them to be happy too.

Include All the Children

One of the biggest issues that combined families have is that some of the children begin to feel neglected and left out. The parent of one set of children begins to pay way too much attention to their new step children and in turn makes their own children feel badly. You should never overdo it when it comes to your spouseâ€™s children.

All of the children should be treated equally and fairly. Be sure to listen to each of them when they try talking to you. Relationship communication is essential if you really want your newly combined family to be successful. Talk to each other and listen as well. This will improve your chances of having a happy family.

Down with Discipline

Relationship help: A step parent should never dish out the discipline to their step children. Disciplining a spouseâ€™s children often creates a rift in the marital and family relationship. Saying no when a child wants a cookie is a different story than grounding a child or taking away privileges. You can however, use your relationship communication skills to let the child know that their behavior didnâ€™t make you happy but always leave the actual punishment to the biological parent.

The Need to Be Alone

Even though you and your new spouse have kids, you still need to find the time to be alone together. A couple must nurture their own marriage as well as work on their relationship communication skills.

You need not empty your bank account to spend time together. A romantic picnic in the park, a quiet drive in the mountains or just a lunch at your favorite restaurant. It doesnâ€™t matter what you do so long as you are spending quality time alone together.

Family Time

It is equally important that you spend time together as a family. Again, family time doesnâ€™t have to cost a lot of money. Try playing Frisbee or having a game of whiffle ball as a family. Even a water balloon fight could bring you all closer and improve your family relationship.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/relationship-articles/advice-for-relationship-for-combined-families.htm - Article Side

Jim Anderson - About Author:
Jim Anderson is a freelance writer who writes extensively about people tackling problems in their a marriage relationships and the relationship quotes which provide practical relationship help. He provides advice for relationship to help people improve relationship communication in their love and relationships.

Article Keywords:
relationship communication, advice for relationship, relationship help, marriage relationships, advice on relationships, love advice

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!