How Van Leasing Works by Robbert H Cullen

Article published on July 30th 2012 | Self Help

Van leasing is the same as leasing a car, a truck or any other type of vehicle. Leasing a van means you get to use it for a specific period of time. However, it is important to remember that van leasing is not the same as van rental. Van rentals are only limited to a very short length of time while leasing has a much longer duration. Leasing a van requires a lease term of at least one year.

If you are thinking of leasing a van then you must first consider the price. It is important that you go through extra lengths to get the best price available in the market. If the leasing company is open to negotiation then by all means negotiate for a great deal. However, before you agree to anything you must demand for a written contract where all of the terms of the lease are in detail. It is not wise to agree to a verbal agreement that you have discussed with a sales representative over the phone. You must ask for a written contract so that you can be sure that all of the terms you have bargained for are included.

When leasing a van the cost of the lease will be distributed over the number of months that is stated on your lease term. This means that you do not need to shell out a huge amount of money to lease the van. Leasing a van is also a lot cheaper because you are not buying it. When the lease contract ends, you will not own a van. After the contract expires, you have the option to either return the van or purchase it.

Aside from the monthly lease fees that you need to pay there are also other fees that you need to shoulder such as taxes, insurance, licensing fees and other fees that are stated in the terms of the contract. This is why it is very imperative that you read the contract thoroughly so that you know all of the fees that you need to shoulder in the lease of the van. In van leasing, you will also agree to keep the van in excellent running condition for the whole duration of the lease. At the end of the lease, the leasing company will inspect the van to make sure that it is not damaged in any way. Small scratches or dents on the surface of the van will be acceptable. But if they see any serious damages then you will be required to pay some additional charges.
