Article Side

Things to Follow While Changing Career by Mark Bennett

Article published on February 16th 2012 | Self Help

There may be situations where you have felt dissatisfied with your current job. You don't seem to have the same interest which you had first when you joined as a trainee. Maybe the environment has changed or a strict management has come in place, whatever it is; the signs show you that it is high time for you look for another job or career. You must be working as a waiter, receptionist, mailman, storage solution advisor, etc. Once you are not satisfied, there is no point in doing that job.

One thing you must know is that changing careers can be a huge commitment in terms of time, money, risk and effort. You can make this commitment well worth if you do as much research as possible before taking the plunge. Seriously, the more thought and preparation you put in ahead of time, the more likely you are to end up in a happy situation where you enjoy your job, make the salary you need and otherwise create the work-life that you want. But what are the best ways to find out about a new career without actually jumping in and getting a new job? Well to know that just continue reading this article and find out.

Firstly, check in online career web sites and books. The easiest place to start is by reading online information about various careers. There are millions of websites which give overall career and industry descriptions and can help you to browse through the related careers. You might also simply use a search engine to find information about your prospective career. If youâ€™re someone who likes to read, there are also many books written on different careers as well. But donâ€™t stop there as this is really only the tip of your iceberg.

Next, check for industrial-group events. There are a myriad of professional organizations out there, many of which have local chapters, and they often have good information on their websites. Besides that these industrial groups often run networking events, happy hours or speakers which besides being informational on the surface are likely to be filled with people who have experience working in the career youâ€™re considering. Experienced people and job analyst will be your greatest career research resource.

Go for or have informal interviews. One of the greatest sources of information about a new career will be the experience of people whoâ€™ve worked in that career, the venue for obtaining that information is the informational interview. You could attend interviews for the desired career and learn from them what is expected in this career. Besides that you could know how well you can develop in this career and to what position you can reach. Try to learn how the interviewer felt when he or she took up this career and their growth-rate. You could also find people at a networking event or on Linkedin and invite them for a cup of coffee to pick their brain.

Donâ€™t stop at one or two interviews, try to talk to more people. You need to get a better understanding of the career, so try to talk to many people and get their feedback. While one person may hate certain aspects of their career, others may love the same parts. The more perspective you can get, the better.

Lastly, if you get a chance, try to volunteer or do a part-time job that relates to your career. This will give you the first-hand experience of how this career is and what are the works involved. You can also know whether it is stressful or an easy job to do.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/self-help-articles/things-to-follow-while-changing-career.htm - Article Side

Mark Bennett - About Author:
Mark is a freelance writer and columnist. He has written many articles on career growth, organization, employment, etc. Most of his free time is spent on surfing the web to collect information about the latest technology, gizmos and various a storage solution techniques and service providers.

Article Keywords:
Storage solution, career, success

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!