You canâ€™t fight anger with anger!

Heather Protz

Article published on March 8th 2012 | Self Help

Teenagers and their parents are always arguing about the most mundane of things. Be it, the color choice in buying a dress or relaxing the time limit for a curfew-always disagreeing. Parents find themselves close to ripping their hair out and the children end up close to breaking something precious. Like momâ€™s favorite vase or dadâ€™s new phone.

Itâ€™s all about pent up frustrations, warring egos and miscommunication. How do you avoid this? Well you canâ€™t avoid fighting. Thereâ€™s always going to be a difference of opinions. But what you can do i handle delicate situations well, delicately. When you know an argument is impending, cool down and vanquish that unnecessary anger of yours. Tell your teen slowly and calmly why you feel that something is right or why donâ€™t want he/she to be doing something or how something could be harmful for them. Itâ€™s hard to get their attention but once you do and make them sit down, chances are they might actually listen. Clear emphasis on chances, they might not listen to you the first time. Keep trying patiently and youâ€™ll succeed. There are those teens with a rebellious streak that make doing anything and everything against what you say, their life time mission. They can be a handful, but be patient and theyâ€™ll learn from their mistakes. It can be particularly hard and painstaking for parents to watch their children go through troubles, but they never listened did they? Offer them comfort during these times and theyâ€™ll eventually listen.

Teenagers go through that time of life where they want to be independent for the most part and stay away from the parents. They want to explore new ideas, experiment and have fun. Parents are specifically worried about this experimenting stage of life. What if my 15 year old son is forced to attend a frat party because of peer pressure? What if he is exposed to unwanted stuff there? These are the actions that the son or daughter commits. Although there are outside factors accounting to it, keep in mind that your ward is old enough to know what he/she does is right or wrong. Itâ€™s not that easy. Being doubtful or suspicious about your own children is unhealthy to your relationship with them. No matter how much you try to hide those suspicions, one day theyâ€™ll be revealed and it will be ugly. This is much worse than confronting the problem then and there.

But hereâ€™s an alternative method to remove that fear. Start communicating with your teen. That should be easy right? Donâ€™t have a bad start. As mentioned before, miscommunication is one of the causes to the extending gap between you and your child. Itâ€™s never too late- Start posing questions subtly about your son/daughterâ€™s life. Start getting to know him/her more, he/she is not what they were a few years ago. Everything from their likes and dislikes to their characteristics might change. Be prepared for this sudden change in behavior. Donâ€™t get upset if your son doesnâ€™t want to go to h favorite ice cream parlor on his birthday anymore. Perhaps you should buy him a computer with a fast internet connection like Comcast? Fortunately, there are some Comcast offers at present so you can buy an Internet connection at good prices.

It has to be done. You canâ€™t protect your kid from the evils of the Internet. They will be exposed to all that when they get to college anyway. Speaking about college-its college! What do you expect? Your baby girl may be Queen Pristine but what about the other kids that go there? You canâ€™t expect them to stay the hell away from her. She has to make friends, learn to pick the good ones from the bad ones all on her own. You canâ€™t talk her through that. Face it. The truth maybe harsh, but this confusing period of parenthood is totally worth it, when they break free and become beautiful individuals.

Article Source:

http://www.articleside.com/self-help-articles/you-can-t-fight-anger-with-anger.htm - Article Side

Heather Protz - About Author:
Heather is a cheery, enthusiastic college student. As an education major, she likes to research about the best suited learning methods. She is interested in cooking, pottery, creative visualization, and like all other teenagers, surfs the Internet on her laptop she bought througha Comcast offers

Article Keywords:
Comcast offers

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!