The key to attracting customers is to make your website attractive by Stefen

Article published on January 14th 2012 | Seo

A well designed website can be often compared with a designer store. The store could be selling garments or shoes or suitcases or may be music systems. So often when you are visiting a shopping mall, the way the window dressing of a store is done attracts your eye balls towards what is in the window. The same happened to Meg as she was passing by the store selling the music systems. She stops by to have a closer look at the window and her eyes are instantly fixed at the way the window is set up.

Then she starts thinking why not enter the store and see what is inside as she is almost enticed and attracted towards the store. As Meg walks in, her interest level grows manifold as she is left wondering which one to buy. It is quite a different matter that when Meg had entered the mall, she had no plans to stop by a store selling music systems, leave alone buy one. It felt nice as she touched and felt the speakers of various sizes and power outputs.

The store attendant so very kindly guided her and told her how one system was different from other and after spending a good forty five minutes inside the store, she had made up her mind that next month she would make it a point to come back and get herself one. Additionally she was a lot of more educated and enriched at the end of the visit to the store. That is the power of design and the power of design has the same importance while designing a website as well. While your website resides amongst millions and zillions of others in the congested space called internet, it is so very crucial to appear unique and attract a visitor right inside your website so that the visitor not only spends some time browsing through your site, but also is left enriched, educated and makes it a point to come back to your website.
