Eco-Friendly Clothes Vs. Recycling Unwanted Clothes by Sahirah Hailey

Article published on December 21st 2011 | Shopping

The concept of eco-friendly clothes has found resonance among societies these days. With more people becoming conscious about our environment, people prefer to buy goods that do not have significant effect on mother nature. However, there is a parallel concept to eco friendly clothing - recycling unwanted clothes. In fact, the two are synonymous and are similar at the core fundamentals. Let's discuss the two concepts and how you can make a difference.

Eco-Friendly Clothes - The New Fashion

Eco friendly clothes are manufactured using environmentally safe practices and employ materials that do not harm the nature. All the processes, right from the manufacturing to selling, are carried out with the help of modern technology resulting in minimum environmental effect. The use of plastics and non-biodegradable materials is kept to a bare minimum making it eco-friendly. The companies also make sure all this is reflected in their branding campaigns to take leverage of eco-friendly image. They go to great lengths to showcase how their manufacturing processes and equipment help create a clean environment. And for good reason. People are allured by eco friendly products and wear such clothes with less guilt. There is a conscience attached to these clothes.

Recycling Unwanted Clothes

Textile recycling is not new and comprises of huge international companies as well. Unlike eco-friendly clothing realm, this industry thrives on all kinds of textiles. There is a huge demand for used clothing and this industry does not disappoint. Almost everyone has unwanted clothes that are not worn due to myriad reasons. Majority of these clothes are not damaged and can still be worn after some repairs. So, what do you do with unwanted clothes? These days, you can find an online portal and trade in your unwanted clothes for some quick cash. Simply log in, order a sack, fill it with clothes and get cash after cloth inspection. Interesting way to clean up the wardrobe and earn some bucks.

Integrate Recycling and Eco-Friendly Clothing

Perhaps the best way to save environment from textile mess is to integrate recycling with eco friendly cloth manufacturing. Just imagine having a huge textile units manufacturing eco-friendly clothes and in turn reducing their carbon footprint. Once worn out, these unwanted clothes can be recycled for some cash. It would be great since the cost of manufacturing is already less and buying recycled will be much more cheaper. Suddenly, fashion seems to be in everyone's reach.

Millions of tons of unwanted clothes can be recycled every year provided there is a efficient collection and distribution system in place. Unlike today, clothes can be worn up to their full shelf life. Young people can survive the tide of fashion by simply recycling their clothes. Unwanted clothes have the ability to lighten up someone else's dreams. Our online platform aims to streamline the system of recycling unwanted clothes and you in turn can get some value out of your old wardrobe.
