Entertainment is big business; cinemas across the world continue to pull in vast crowds of film fans eager to experience the magic of the big screen. But with cinema goers dwindling, opting instead to stay at home with their home theatre systems, is the magic starting to wear off?

This home theatre systems argument seems to pop up every now and then; they even said the same thing back in the 50s when the television made its debut.

Even so, home theatre systems are now more popular than ever, with more and more people now spending their hard earned cash designing entire rooms in their house thatâ€™ll be fit for the purpose – surely a testament to the devotion of film buffs everywhere.

Many now see home theatre systems as the ultimate way to spend an evening, unwinding after work, or with friends at the weekend, and itâ€™s easy to why.

It seems virtually impossible these days to browse an electrical store and find a television with a screen size less than 42”, and it isn’t hard to see why, especially with the latest developments in high definition video and 3D.

In fact, technology can be seen to chart the rise of home theatre systems, with Blu-ray now offering you an unbridled crystal clear picture, it seems such a waste not to invest in a bigger screen to enjoy it on.
