Consumers Oppose General Steel Corporation Selling Tactics of General Steel Buildings by Nathan Wright

Article published on March 23rd 2012 | Society

Consumers are opposing General Steel Corporation for their selling tactics of General Steel buildings. Since 2000, consumers have filed complaints and shared their experiences with the corporation. They accuse the company of fraud.

General Steel Corporation is accused of taking millions of dollars in deposits from customers. According to some complaints, they make promises and don't deliver. There are consumers that have paid over $300,000 in deposits.

Many consumers feel they are victims of a scam with General Steel Corporation. They were victimized and the company did nothing to resolve the problem. They took large amounts of deposits and never delivered.

Consumers are required to pay a deposit when ordering a General Steel building. The cost of General Steel buildings ranges from approximately $25,000 to over $130,000. The deposit can cost a consumer from $5,000 to over $50,000.

The price for just the base metal building alone can cost over $140,000. There are different sizes of buildings at different prices. The cost of the base does not include the windows, doors and other accessories.

Sometimes consumers are not told the specifics and details of the pricing. Thereby, agreeing with General Steel Corporation terms and sending a deposit. They pay a deposit upfront for the plan and drawings.

Once the deposit is received the consumers are sent plans and drawings of their General Steel building. The plan is an anchor bolt setting plan and the drawing is an engineered certified erection drawing.

This is where the problems arise. Consumers disagree with the plan and drawings and ask General Steel Corporation to correct. They never receive a corrected plan and drawings and become dissatisfied.

When General Steel Corporation is asked to return a customer's deposit, they are told it was forfeited. Consumers are given all kind of excuses why their deposits can't be returned. Which leaves the consumer at a great loss.

Non-profit organizations, such as churches have experienced some type of injustice business dealings with General Steel Corporation, according to some complaints. These consumers have paid millions of dollars in deposits for General Steel buildings.

The consumers who have had bad experiences ordering General Steel buildings, can now voice their complaints loudly. Numerous complaints have been filed against General Steel Corporation. But the company seems not to care.

According to some consumers, General Steel doesn't care who they victimize. Victims of natural disasters, public officials, churches, and others have fallen prey to the corporation. Victims can now take a stand and receive valuable information.

Consumers who feel they are victims of a scam have a voice. They can share with others their experiences with a building supplier. They can warn other consumers needing a steel metal building.
