Negligence is a failure of the exercise of care that a reasonably prudent person should practice under certain circumstances. The area of tort law known as negligence involves harm caused by carelessness, not intentional harm. Different types of negligence cases have been analyzed in the past in stages, called elements, similar to the analysis of crimes.

An important concept related to elements is that if a claimant fails to prove any one element of his negligence claims, he loses on the entire tort claim. For example, a particular tort has four elements. Each element must be proven. If the plaintiff proves only three or two of the four elements, the plaintiff has not succeeded in making out his claim.

Common law jurisdictions may differ slightly in the exact categorization of the elements of negligence, but the things that should always be taken under consideration in case of negligence are duty, breach, causation, and damages. Negligence is associated mainly with three basic elements - conduct, causation and damages. Sometimes, it is said to have four (duty, breach, causation and economic damages) or five (duty, breach, actual cause, nearby cause, and damages) more elements each one of which vary from each other depending on the characteristics of the same.
