A car hit you while returning home from office. You tripped on the neighborâ€™s slippery sidewalk and broke your ankle. If you remember closely, such incidents have occurred more than once if not to you then at least to somebody you know. The only common link between all such incidents is their association to third party negligence. So, if you have suffered injuries on account of another personâ€™s negligence, it certainly does not make sense to sit down and take it all, does it? Hence, do not think twice before filing a Personal injury compensation case if your accident had a third party angle to it.

In the first place, consult a doctor even if your injury does not seem way too serious. Injuries that appear minor at the outset can turn into something disastrous in the long run. If possible, take pictures of any lacerations, scratches, contusions, or inflammations to verify the injury.

Get the accident documented by keeping exact records of the date, location, time, lost wages, injuries sustained and medical costs. If the accident involved a motor vehicle, be sure to note down the road and weather conditions, visible hazards etc.

Before you go ahead with personal injury compensation claims, file a report with the local police. You will need copies of the report in filing the personal injury claims case.

Look for people who had witnessed the accident. Eye witnesses play a key role in settling Personal injury Compensation Claims. Testimonies provided by such individuals can actually indicate the guilty half.

Preserve evidences showing who was at fault. This can include a broken step, a damaged vehicle or ripped clothing. It should be remembered that hands-on evidences count several times more compared to verbal or written description.

After you are done with all the steps listed above, it is time to calculate all out-of-pocket expenses. It is best to put your estimates at three times the figure in determining the real value of all your sufferings and pains. These, in brief, are steps that may help you in settling a case of personal injury claims.
