A Revolution Sparked by the Police Computers by James Blee

Article published on April 18th 2012 | Software

Maintaining a countryâ€™s law and order is the responsibility of the police. They are also entitled to present people committing any type of criminal or illegal acts before the court of law. Initially, process of identifying a crime, nabbing the criminals and punishing them was done manually and intellectual effort, which failed sometimes. But with the advent of computers and internet, the police and security force have found it easier to nab the wrongdoers. Here rises the importance of the police computers.

The police computers have been put to innumerable uses, since the inception and have come a long way in detection and identification. As the days are passing by, the government is making it compulsory for the police department to be aware of the uses and operations of the computers and laptops, so that a piece of information can be collected in fractions of a second, unlike the previous days. With the help of the computers, the police force really finds it easy to detect the prime suspects, check the status of the vehicles used for the crime, match fingerprints and a host of other activities which were unimaginable even a few years back. To tally past records, they donâ€™t have to search in heaves of dust infested files. Unnecessary paperwork and wastage of time can be avoided, which can otherwise be utilized for carrying out the investigation process. To get the update on a particular case, a police officer can simply view the status updates, instead of making phone calls and visiting the sites.

With the advent of software solutions, a police laptop has become very much beneficial. The mobile tracking software helps the police to get information about the place from where the call is being made. This helps to track a stolen or lost mobile, or sometimes even get hold of a fleeing criminal.
