The long awaited dream of having Android for Windows has finally been fulfilled by USA based company BlueStacks. Software with the same name BlueStacks has been launched in its beta stage to make run Android apps on pc a reality. To their surprise a whopping 550 thousand download requests were received in just 50 days of the launch. People are eagerly waiting for the official and final version to be available.

Not only this, the company has already found their investors who are planning to invest big sum of money for the development of the entire project. The major investors AMD and Citrix are hoping to see big in this small startup company. As Microsoft is in plan to launch the big size of tablet in mid 2010, Android for Windows seems to be huge hit in the near future and a lot can be expected for the company. The software pack supports Windows Vista and Windows XP alike, however a more research and development is pending to release the version for Windows 7. Though, with good financial support and technical support, that would not be a big problem to develop a common Android for Windows of all versions.

With just one application installation, your pc is now ready to run over thousand of Android apps in a moment. However, not all apps of Android on Windows are a possibility as many used to have the GPRS and motion sensing features. Apart from these apps, the rest is all fine with BlueStacks. Over 65% of general Android app can be easily run on Windows with the use of keyboard and mouse. In addition, BlueStacks has also developed a version for Mac users. They are here to make life happier for one and all.

With support from AMD, the hardware group and Citrix, the virtualization expert, BlueStacks Android for Windows is sure to hit the market with a bank once the full version is launched. The development is not only aimed at making the playing experience a fun-filled but also to sync the users data from Android device to the pc and vice versa.
