Guaranteeing the Legal Utilization of Software by Samantha Cole

Worldwide software piracy rate spiked at 43% in 2009, according to the Business Software Alliance. In the same year, an additional $75 worth of unlicensed software penetrated the market for every $100 of authentic software purchased. Because this increase is very worrying, individuals are urged to be cautious when getting software. One thing they must always examine is the software's license.

Software is an intellectual property that needs the individual to first get a license before s/he can make use of it. Luckily, any software purchased by a customer or a company comes with a license-except if it is a freeware. This indicates that all buyers of a certain software instantly obtain permission from the producer to use the program. Additionally, the code and agreement incorporated in the software, referred to as End User Licensee Agreement (EULA), presents just how the software can be used. Only by agreeing to these conditions and terms can the user successfully set up the program.

There are two basic kinds of software licenses: multiuser and single user. A single user license permits use of software for small ventures such as those that rely on home computers or small-scale businesses. Differently, a multiuser license enables a bigger number of individuals to access and make use of the software. This is appropriate for companies that must offer their employees with accessibility to the same software

If a software is classified as a freeware, it implies that it can be used and downloaded free of charge. Alternatively, if it is a shareware, it indicates that the software is copyrighted but still free of charge for download and use. Although both kinds seem to be enticing since they are free, they can be disadvantageous in some ways. For example, they may have limited features and will expire after some period. If users intend to continue utilizing a certain software such as the Blackberry Enterprise Server, the manufacturer may require payment from them.

With the increasing need for licensed computer and phone software, many companies began providing such programs at competitive rates. In addition, if a business or an individual needs one or several units of the Blackberry Enterprise Server software, the companies can ship what is required within a couple of days.

Besides competitive prices, suppliers of Blackberry Enterprise Sever and other programs also provide affirmation similar to that of the producer. When users would like to buy the software for a huge operation, the company can send out as many licenses as the customer wants-even for 100 or more units.
