If you are sitting in the 19th Hole bar, sipping a beer and staring down mournfully at you golf card, wondering where it all went wrong, then now could be a good time to consider getting a golf coach.

It is instructive to realize that ALL of the top gold professionals have a golf coach, and many of them have considerably more than one to cover putting, driving, chipping and the golf swing.

So, ask yourself this question:

If Tiger Woods or Ernie Els have a golf coach, and they are rather better than me, then might it be a good idea for me to get one?

The answer is clearly yes, and the good news is that it is neither as complicated of as expensive as you might think to get yourself a good instructor.

The first thing that you need to do is to take yourself down to your local golf course and have a chat with the resident golf professional who can talk you through your options. You will then be able to talk through the different areas of your game that need improvement and discuss possible golf lessons that you could take in order to improve your golf game.

Whist there are clearly many facets to the game of golf, you will generally find that you very first golf instructor should really be focusing on improving your overall golf swing. The reason for this is that the golf swing is the engine behind the game of golf, and so tuning that engine can potentially have the maximum impact on lowering your scores and achieving the kind of low scores in your golf games that you both really crave and deserve.

The truth is that golf is not a complicated game, but like many things that are not complicated, that isnâ€™t too say it is simple. Far from it! And so you need to be well versed in doing the little things right in order to really prosper. Often times then a golf coach is not going to radically change the way that you do things. He will generally just change a few key areas such as the length of your back swing, your angle of approach, or the speed at which you strike the ball. But getting those little things right is the difference between low scores and a happy face at the 19th hole, and feeling miserable at another round that hasnâ€™t quite matched up to expectations.

The other aspect of hiring a golf coach is that because you will have to set up a regular schedule in which to meet him, it means that you will be playing much more regularly, and this inevitably will have the knock-on effect that your game will improve, even if you donâ€™t do anything else all that much differently
