Three Must-Haves of a New York Security Company by Fernando Severns

Article published on May 14th 2012 | Technology

If you manage a business in New York with a huge inventory of goods, or if you own a warehouse, one thing you certainly need is a security company. Security companies in New York are practically a dime a dozen, so while thereâ€™s a wide range to choose from, you wonder how to choose the right one for your company. There are a thousand and one things to consider, but all that can be narrowed down to simply three things a security company must be able to show you.

License

According to the Federal Bureau of Investigationâ€™s Uniform Crime Reports for 2010, New York ranks as the 3rd highest state for property crime after Ohio and Arizona. With the state being one of the most populated and commercially dense, businesses and residents try to fulfill their security needs. In New York, a security company must secure the proper licenses prior to operating as one. The state's Division of Licensing Services outline stringent rules to qualify for the license.

Security companies require owners to be a principal in the business, with no disqualifying criminal convictions, and with pass marks on its licensing exams. The state has a web site where a companyâ€™s business' license can be verified.

Insurance

Any sensible business acquires insurance for itself. In many states insurance is a requirement to secure a license. New York's General Business Law under Watch, Guard and Patrol Agencies virtually necessitates companies getting insurance prior to operating a security firm in the state. The state takes action when a security firm fails to comply with that.

Moreover, security companies New York insurance can protect you from having to shoulder the medical costs of its employees should they be hurt while on duty. Inquire from the security firm some details of their insurance like the name of their insurance company and insuranceâ€™s certificate number. You can check out those details with their insurance provider.

Certification

Currently New York law doesn't require security companies Long Island or New York residents consult to have some kind of certification. On the other hand, having some certification from a reputable third party or trade organization can boost confidence in their services. For security companies, they can acquire such from known organizations like the Security Industry Association (SIA) or the National Associate of Government Contractors (NAGC).

When checking with security companies New York businesses use, ask for their affiliations with trade organizations. Whatever services they provide, or accreditations they display, try to verify what they show you with those listed organizations. Read more about them at EzineArticles.com and Msn.com.
