Why You Could Benefit from Having a Landline by Julie Winters

Article published on April 19th 2012 | Technology

In a world where wireless technology is commonplace and almost all of us have a mobile phone, you may be of the opinion that a landline is only necessary in your home in order to get access to the fastest broadband services available in your local area. The truth is, this is not the case, especially if you often find that you make more phone calls from your mobile phone and consequently get charged in excess of your monthly tariff. If you like nothing more than you curl up on the sofa and natter away with your nearest and dearest, a great landline deal could mean those extra charges on your mobile bill will be a thing of the past.

While many mobile phone contracts look like they offer great value for money, if you exceed your monthly tariff, you will be charged a significant amount per minute for calls but will not find out that you have gone over your allowance till your bill comes through and you have no other option but to pay it. Many landline deals offered by home phone service providers feature free calls in the evening and at weekends, so if you make the majority of your lengthly calls during these times, it is well worth taking the time to browse the packages on offer in your area.

Of course, there are some stipulations to these free call plans. A call will only be free of charge if it lasts less than 60 minutes, for example. To ensure you do not end up getting charged, time your call or set an alarm and agree with the person you are speaking with to hang up the phone and ring back after 55 minutes.

Calls from landlines are generally cheaper than calls from mobile phones. It is possible to find home phone call packages that enable you to call other landlines for free on weekday evenings and at weekends. Calls to mobile phones tends to be excluded from these deals but if you shop around on a landline price comparison site, you may be able to find a package that is expressly tailored to suit people that predominantly ring mobile phones.

It is also increasingly common for providers to offer multiple services- like broadband home phone and digital TV- all bundled into one package. The discounts offered on these bundle deals are substantial and can be extremely alluring, but there are reports of it being troublesome to switch providers if you become dissatisfied with the services you receive, due to the disparity in the services each provider supplies.

So what are you waiting for? To find a great landline deal, visit a comparison site today. You will not regret it.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/technology-articles/why-you-could-benefit-from-having-a-landline.htm - Article Side

Julie Winters - About Author:
Homephone Choices is a leading comparison site that specialises in helping you find cheap landline deals. By simply entering your postcode, you can find a great call plan with a a practically free landline . Live rurally? Remember- there is a no loss of signal with a landline .

Article Keywords:
landline, practically free landline, no loss of signal with a landline

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!