Permanent resident Australia is a non Australian citizen resident in Australia who has been given permission under the migration act to remain indefinitely in Australia. Permanent visas may be granted onshore or offshore depending on the type of visa. Onshore visas require all family members to be in Australia at the time of grant and offshore visas normally require all family members to be outside Australia at the time of grant. Permanent residence Australia gives you the freedom to work for any employer in Australia or take time out from the workforce. Losing one existing job does not mean having to leave Australia and children can work without jeopardizing their dependant status.

Some professions which are closed to temporary residents become open and family members, especially spouses will find employers more willing to hire them if they are permanent residents. Spouses and children of the main applicant can still remain in Australia if the main applicant is deceased or if there is a family breakdown. You are also entitled for Medicare and for health insurance at the same rates as Australian. You can apply for citizenship after meeting residence requirements and children born in Australia are Australian citizens by birth.

If you go outside Australia for more than a few years usually lead to loss of resident status and there are exemptions for those with special ties to Australia. Even if you retain resident status, absence may break continuity of residence for citizenship purposes and if you want to travel and re-enter Australia as a resident, you need a re-entry facility on your visa or a resident return visa. As a permanent resident you do not have to carry evidence of your status on your person at all times in Australia.

Australia is one of the most popular destinations and a beautiful country for foreigners. One of the decisions you will have to make when move to Australia is choosing where to live. Once you move to Australia, you will start to enjoy the weather, your recreational time and the great outdoors. Australia is packed with things to see and do, from going to the beach, to theme park, Whale watching and 4 wheel driving. While to plan your move you need to have the right visa for you to live and work in Australia. You need to prove that you will not be a threat to the security of Australia and you have no criminal records.
