Article published on July 18th 2012 | Travel Tips

United States Federal law does not allow you to transport dangerous and hazardous materials during your residential move without informing your moving company or transportation carrier. Any such violation can result in 5 years jail term or a fine of $ 250,000 or more. Apart from this you are risking the loss of your items by damage or fire or contamination.

If you happen to pack hazardous items in your moving boxes or ship them along with your furniture then you would be considered as a hazardous item transporter. In such a case there are many laws that you need to follow depending on the state you are in. So if you feel that any of the items that you are moving could be hazardous, then its best to check with your moving company.

Moving to a Smaller Home? Downsize Now

Often we come across the situation of moving to a smaller place. It is natural to have a lot of household items accumulated over a period of time. It is not going to be easy to get rid of some of these items if you donâ€™t have the space for them at your new location. On second thought it might be actually possible to reduce the stuff that you are going to move into your new location provided you do it methodically.

Here are a few tips which would help you reduce a lot of time and energy in such a situation as moving to a smaller home.

Accessing what you actually need in your day to day life actually involves in prioritizing on things that you are or going to use in the next few days. Get rid of things that you think that could be useful in a year or so. For example you might have a treadmill lying around somewhere taking up a lot of space. If you havenâ€™t been using it for a while then get rid of it. Technology always keeps advancing and by the time you decide to burn some calories you might as well get a latest model rather than using an out dated one. Get rid of things like that. Even non working electronic items can be put away with as it keeps depreciating in value and features day by day.

Storage areas are a good place to start looking for things that you will not be needing. Basements, attics etc are the areas you want to start with. There could be many things which would not have seen sunlight for years. Get rid of them.

Even after getting rid of items that you will not be using, you might still have certain things that need to be retained. Put them all into boxes so that it goes straight into your new storage place. You will save a lot of money by not carrying useless stuff hence making your relocation a cost effective one be it a local move or a long distance move.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/travel-tips-articles/risks-of-shipping-hazardous-items-during-your-residential-move.htm - Article Side

John Fish - About Author:
a Getapacker.com is a one stop point for all your moving needs. Be it finding a Moving Company for your relocation, or checking out their licenses to writing reviews ,we have it all integrated into a single platform. We give you unlimited access to our updated database of Moving Companies. From a Local Movers to a Long Distance movers we have it all.

Article Keywords:
residential move, storage, moving company, moving, movers, movers license, moving tips, moving box, long distance move

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!