Suppose you're a vacationer going to a destination like San Francisco, California for the very first time; you settle into your hotel to get some shut-eye after a lengthy, tiring flight, and you expect things to turn out nicely. Regrettably, not every traveler can stay clear of a traumatizing hotel encounter. It's rather understandable to file a complaint, but in many instances there's a "socially acceptable" way to do it to achieve your objective. Here are several guidelines for filing a reasonable complaint with your hotel.

Choose your battles

As the saying goes, choose your battles. Are you complaining to the hotel manager about loud people directly your window, or are you wondering why there's no running water? Depending on how you sincerely feel regarding the whole circumstance, analyze whether what you're complaining about can inevitably make things much worse or if it's worth reporting to someone.

Work your way up

Front desk employees are considered the front liners. See if you can start with them since it's quite possible they are authorized to fix a few matters right there and then. Fight the temptation to automatically ask for the supervisor or manager, but try working it out with the front liners. If the front desk staff couldn't provide solutions and gives you no options whatsoever, then you can take it as high up as you can go.

Maintain proper decorum

It may feel satisfying to vent your anger against the front liners who work for the type of hotels San Francisco Union Square visitors prefer, but people may not be as inclined to assist if they're being mistreated. You yourself might not feel like assisting anyone who shouts at you and reprimands you, right? It may feel hard at times, but a measure of politeness and respect can go a long way toward resolving your predicaments. Out of the 16 million visitors San Francisco accommodates annually, you wouldn't wanna end up as the principal characterin a viral video now, would you?

Be as specific as possible

Finally, you get to advise the staff at Union Square hotels San Francisco visitors prefer what your real concern is after reprimanding them for over 20 minutes, squandering valuable time in which the problem could've been addressed right away. Just describe the problem at once - i.e. no running water or stained bed sheets - and advise them what results you expect. Generally, they can assist you promptly as soon as they know what the problem is all about.

Put it in writing

In case you stayed in a chain of Union Square hotels San Francisco locals recommend - like Super 8 - you may still send a written complaint to its central office right after your stay. Search for their web site, get their contact info, e-mail a a detailed account, and hope you receive a response.
