Toilet cubicles are certainly not one of the most glamorous purchases you will ever make but are nonetheless a necessity given the modern social convention surrounding visiting the toilet. Chances are that unless you work for a construction firm or own a business premises privately then you will not have to buy toilet cubicles yourself.

However they are one of the most common features of communal toilet areas in modern buildings and older constructions which have been brought up to date in line with contemporary customs. With that in mind here is a guide to toilet cubicles:

The primary purpose for toilet cubicles is privacy. Not many people like the idea of urinating or defecating without some sort of barrier protecting their modesty. Therefore toilet cubicles are in demand as they can be locked to prevent anyone from seeing the individual occupying them.

Toilet cubicles are used in all sorts of buildings.

It is a legal requirement for places of work to have proper toilet facilities for male and female members of staff. Indeed for anywhere which is a communal property and has more than one toilet unit in the washroom cubicles are an essential purchase.

The choice of toilet cubicles depends on the facilities you have. For instance a large building would need several toilet bowls side by side in which case modular units with a sheet of MDF separating each toilet would be appropriate. Many of these would not quite reach the floor and ceiling so would not quite be fully enclosed but would be sufficient to protect the occupantâ€™s modesty. Male washrooms generally have less washroom cubicles as they have urinals but womenâ€™s toilet cubicles are more numerous for obvious reasons.
