Choosing the Right Wedding Dress for Your Body Type by Kindra Leomiti

A woman's wedding day is definitely one of the highlights of her life and her womanhood. Hence, wedding preparations should be carefully outlined up to its smallest detail. One can start doing this by hiring a wedding planner or getting tips from them. Essentially, a wedding should be memorable and an enjoyable experience for the bride instead of being stressful because of arduous and countless preparations.

One of the main concerns of the bride-to-be would be her wedding gown. Unlike promenade gowns which can be bought in department stores, wedding gowns are customized or tailored to specifically fit the bride. Designers make it a point to make their works unique and durable to make the bride stand out and to avoid any wardrobe malfunction during the occasion.

Wedding Gowns for Various Physique

Pear-shaped women can do well with an A-line dress. As the gown type name suggests, it has a minimal upper design with a broad or elegantly flowing dress below the mid-waist. This type of dress has a natural flare from mid-waist down making a woman's waist look slender. A-type dress would flatten a woman's broad hips by covering it with the dress's flare.

Busty women can go for a scooped cleavage. However, having a deep cleavage can ruin the gown's entirety and lose focus on other features. When going for a tube, it would be better to have a small heart-shaped dipped design on the cleavage area rather than a straight across design since this will make bust look awkwardly bigger. In the same manner that choosing wedding venues in Palm Desert requires careful selection, the right type of wedding gown should also be chosen with great attention to detail.

Plus-size women can opt for Empire design. This starts just below the bust and creates a flare down the floor. Hip and waist size should be measured for the gown to not look like a maternity dress. Fabric used should not be too "flowy", but have a stiffer base to capture the bride's shape. This will definitely turn heads once the bride walks down the aisle at any of the beautiful wedding venues in Palm Springs.

For tall women, a silhouette is ideal because it emphasizes their natural slenderness. The low waistline can emphasize longer proportions in addition to the floor-sweeping hem. Petite or small-busted women can go for a modified empire or A-type gown. A tightly fitted empire gown and wearing silicone-bra would emphasize bust without making it look unnatural. Wedding planners, apart from recommending ideal caterers, flowers and wedding venues in Pasadena, can also recommend stylists to make the dress more beautiful for the bride.
