Purchasing a Box of Wine by Brian Morris

Article published on February 22nd 2012 | Wine

Choices today for purchasing a box of wine rather than a bottle of wine are extensive. When you are first considering the purchase of a box of wine, you might be thinking about the various misconceptions that are associated with boxed wine.

One common misconception about a box of wine is that it is lower quality. However when you purchase a box of wine you will get the same premium wines that are found in the glass bottles sold in many traditional stores today. The wines are packages at the peak of their flavor and sent to you as soon as possible to provide you with the freshest quality possible.

Another misconception that is common is that a box of wine is only good for large gatherings that will use the whole box without having to store it after it is opened. The truth is that the box of wine is packaged in such a way that the wine will be just as fresh with the first glass as it will be with the last when used within about a month of opening the seal.

When you buy a box of wine, there is a plastic liner on the inside that is sealed to protect the wine as well as protect against leaks. When the box is empty, you can remove the liner and the cap and recycle the cardboard as you would normally. The plastic is recycled wherever plastic is taken. It is sorted by the number found on the plastic.

The truth about a box of wine is that it is the same premium wine that you would expect from a glass bottle. The reason that the price of a box of wine is lower than a bottle is due to the lower cost of packaging. The savings can be passed onto you. You receive premium, high quality wines at a reduced price.

Because your box of wine needs to be shipped there is the added benefit of the less fragile packaging material as well. Glass bottles need special protection when they are shipped to avoid breakage. A box of wine does not require that protection or special handling to avoid problems that are common with glass bottles.

When you make the decision to buy a box of wine, you will find that you receive more of the high quality, premium wine for the price. Additionally the wine will remain fresh just as it would in a glass bottle for a comparable amount of time.
